

When You're A Lover
Owen Danoff

You call yourself an outlaw
With your bandana and your quick feet
You swear you'll never get soft
Never stop for anyone you meet
But her flowing hair flows through your mind
Like a river erodes a stone
When you're a lover, you can't stand to be alone

Oh, I know this part
The frozen heart begins to beat
Start to discover by yourself you're incomplete

She sneaks in through the window
Made of sunlight rays and moonbeams
She's everywhere that you go
And the faces in your daydreams
Til you finally open up your arms
And then she just sweeps you off your feet
When you're a lover, there's only one other that you need

Oh I know this well,
The glow, the spell, the hand to hold
A land full of wonder, where everything is gold

Suddenly the ordinary things have changed,
Every circle is a diamond ring, it's strange
And new, and only for you

When it's all been broken
She's gone and you're still asking why
The front door's hanging open
And all you have to know her by
Is the portrait you've been painting of her
Right behind your eyes
It happened to me, it'll happen to you
Then you're a lover, what a lonely life

Oh, I've seen it all
The fall into love and then down to your knees
Quick as a whisper of wind through the trees
